And yet there are some men who shrink from the thoughta who have a vague presentiment that if the harness cause to brace them up any longer, they will fall down by the wayside and die. I think it is a miserable mistake. Every man should listen to the warnings which benignant Nature is continually, uttering to him. Whether in autumn of life we are cautioned now and then to pause, or whether in the winter of life we are told that the time has come for us to cease altogether from work, we should never reject these promptings. The time must come when younger men will do our work better; and, if we remain still at the grindstone, we shall be little better than cumbevera of the earth. Nay, we may be something worse miserable spectacles of decay, not even stately ruins. Shall we cling thus to a mere mockery and make belief of work - sorry "drivellers and shows"-with dim eyes and close of life we ought to be left to our repose- | ceding one, until to day it is acknowledged to to have time to take account of eternity - be the Cornhill Magazine Our Poor Belations
